Kerry Taylor is the Director of the Ohio Aerospace Hub of Innovation and Opportunity here in Dayton, Ohio. Kerry administers and coordinates all Hub activities associated with attracting aerospace-related businesses into the Hub and the Dayton Region while creating an urban live-work-play-learn environment for creative class professionals. Kerry has over 34 years of experience as an Air Force officer, Congressional Professional Staffer and Industry Business Developer.

The Ohio Aerospace Hub of Innovation and Opportunity is an economic development initiative supported by a partnership of public and private organizations who share a common vision: to revitalize Dayton's reputation as a leader in aerospace by attracting entrepreneurs, innovators, business owners and others through a creative class attraction strategy focused on developing an environment that fosters creativity and growth.

Located in downtown Dayton, the Hub is anchored to the north by TechTown, Dayton's technology-support campus, and to the south by the University of Dayton and its Research Institute.

A diverse pool of talented researchers, professionals and entrepreneurs work in the Hub, which includes business incubators, specialized facilities and equipment and other resources available to help accelerate existing business and nurture new and small companies. Although the Hub is located within a defined area of Dayton, the proximity of regional assets such as Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, the National Composite Center, Tec^Edge, and universities with strong aerospace programs readily facilitates collaboration between world-class researchers and entrepreneurs.
